

My wife Inga (Yale LLM) and I have been teaching at Texas Law School since 1975. I teach Economic Efficiency Analysis, Antitrust Law, Jurisprudence and Constitutional Law, and Legal Scholarship (about the various modes of research that is done about law). Inga is now retired from teaching but not from research. She taught Comparative Law, Comparative Constitutional Law, Socialist vs. Bourgeois law (called SocBourg by the students), Family Law, and Children and the Law.

My most recent book--published by the economics division of Springer--is titled Welfare Economics and Second-Best Theory. I am currently finishing a two-volume study titled Antitrust Policy and Welfare Economics, which the economics division of Springer will also publish. The English title of Inga's most recent book is Servants of Two Masters: East-German Jurists Between the Party and the Law. It has already been published in German. She is currently working on the English translation.

We have five children (all of whom took their BAs at Yale) and twelve grandchildren. Daniel is a professor at Yale Law School; Stefanie is a professor in the Yale Department of English; Benjamin is a professor of literature and creative writing at the University of London and a novelist; Julia is a professor of philosophy at Cornell; and Rebecca is the co-editor of a literary journal, "American Short Fiction."

Inga and I often go to Germany (where she does research and sees family and I teach) and England (where Benjamin lives and other children vacation in the summer). From 1981–1983, I was co-director of the Centre for Socio-Legal Studies at Oxford.

Inga and I have suffered less than most from the virus, in part because our kids call us often, substantially because we continue to see Rebecca and her family (who live in Austin) and in part because we frequently phone with friends. I find Zoom-teaching much less satisfactory than in-person teaching. I am sure the students do too.

I occasionally think of our years at Yale Law School, but my memories are less political than those of correspondents who have kindly included me in their emails about those times. I think of you and all our classmates with great fondness. Inga and I send our best wishes to you all (or should I write, y'all).

- Recycled from Dick's Summer 2021 Class Notes